Quasimodo, the bellringer of Notre Dame, sighed softly as he began his round of chores for the day. My master Frollo told me I'm safe inside these walls, thought Quasimodo, but I want to be out there with the people of Paris. How lucky they are to come and go as they please!

Quasimodo's gargoyle friends, Hugo, Victor, and Laverne, waited for him in his room. Even though they were made of stone, the gargoyles felt sorry for Quasimodo because he never left the cathedral.

"Break out," cried Hugo as Quasimodo swept. "Get outta here, and get some air.
Nobody's gonna know. All ya gotta do is sneak out, and sneak back in!"

Quasimodo thanked Hugo for the thought, but getting away was out of the question. There was simply too much to do today. After all, he explained to his friends, a bellringer has certain responsibilities! Anyway, the bells of Notre Dame were ready for ringing—and a bell such as Big Marie did not like to be kept waiting!

And I almost forgot," Quasimodo said,
"I've been meaning to do some work on my village. I've made a new mobile and there's that baker I wanted to carve!"

"Tut-tut-tut, excuses, excuses," said Victor as he and Laverne wagged their stone fingers at Quasimodo.

"See the sights, smell the roses, just get out of this gloomy room!" shouted Hugo.

As Quasimodo finished putting the last piece of his village in place, a little bird landed on his shoulder. "This is no place for you on a beautiful day like today," Quasimodo smiled. "You should be out there, flying free!"

In that instant, he realized what his friends were trying to tell him. With a wave of thanks to the gargoyles, Quasimodo began the long climb down Notre Dame and out into the world.
